ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

More colleagues than we can possibly name deserve our warm thanks here. First and foremost, of course, are the contributing writers in this volume. Less obviously, this book does not stand alone, but is part of a complex strategy: the contributors’ work here builds on that of forty-three contributors to 2009’s Rethinking Negotiation Teaching and to the parallel special section of eight articles in Negotiation Journal (April 2009), and it presages a further effort of similar proportions in 2011, which will build on this book.

Also key to this effort, and a great comfort at certain moments of doubt, have been our steering committee members: it would be impossible to imagine a more perceptive or more incisive team of advisers than Jay Folberg, Roy Lewicki, Carrie Menkel-Meadow, Sharon Press, Frank Sander, Andrea Schneider, Richard Shell, and Michael Wheeler. Special thanks also to Kitty Atkins, the Dispute Resolution Institute associate director, for her wise counsel and tireless commitment to solve any and all problems. Also essential at Hamline has been Jessica Kuchta-Miller, whose thoughtful edits and careful proofreading helped ensure a quality product, and Debra Berghoff, whose mastery of software and graphics once again has made all our lives much simpler.

Separately, this book, like its predecessor (not to mention the forthcoming editions of Rethinking Negotiation Teaching in Chinese, Arabic and Turkish) would have been impossible without the support of the JAMS Foundation. The Foundation’s early commitment to the project was instrumental to its successful launch, and the Foundation’s continued support helps to extend the project’s global impact.

Finally, we offer special thanks to Istanbul’s Bilgi University, the host institution for our Fall 2009 conference in Turkey, with special recognition for the unflappable Seda Peker, whose logistics skills made everything go smoothly. Last but not least, we applaud the extraordinary effort of Kenneth H. Fox and Manon A. Schonewille, who served as lead trainers for the day-long negotiation course offered at the beginning of our Istanbul conference. For accomplished teachers who are accustomed to having a certain freedom of maneuver out of the purview of their colleagues, it is no small thing to construct a course with a committee looming, and then to teach it in front of experienced peers.

To follow future developments of the project initiative, please visit http://www.hamline.edu/law/adr/negotiation2.0. There you will find the latest project updates, lists of participating scholars, and writings generated to date.

viii