ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

More colleagues than we can possibly name deserve our warm thanks here. First and foremost, of course, are the contributing writers in this volume. Less obviously, this book does not stand alone, but is part of a complex strategy: the contributors’ work here builds on that of the forty-three contributors to 2009’s Rethinking Negotiation Teaching and the parallel special section of eight articles in Negotiation Journal (April 2009), the thirty-seven contributors to 2010’s Venturing Beyond the Classroom, the twenty-three contributors to 2012’s Assessing Our Students, Assessing Ourselves, and the contributors to 谈判 Tán Pàn: The Chinese-English Journal on Negotiation.

None of this would have happened without Giuseppe de Palo, who together with Chris and Jim created the project and served as co-editor for volumes one and two in the series. Volume 3 co-editor Noam Ebner deserves special praise for recognizing that a book specifically dedicated to assessment was both sorely needed, and possible. Also key to this effort have been our steering committee members: it would be impossible to imagine a more perceptive or more incisive team of advisers than Jay Folberg, Roy Lewicki, Carrie Menkel-Meadow, Sharon Press, Frank Sander, Andrea Schneider, Richard Shell, and Michael Wheeler. Thanks also to Kitty Atkins, the Dispute Resolution Institute associate director, for tireless commitment to solve any and all problems. Also essential at Hamline has been Jessica Kuchta-Miller, whose thoughtful edits and careful proofreading helped ensure a quality product, and Debra Berghoff (a/k/a “Magical Hands”), whose mastery of software and graphics once again has made all our lives much simpler.

Separately, this book, like its predecessors, would have been impossible without the support of the JAMS Foundation. The Foundation’s early commitment to the project was instrumental to its successful launch, and the Foundation’s continued support helps to extend the project’s global impact.

Finally, Chris and Jim would be remiss not to offer special thanks to Andrew Wei-Min Lee and Vivian Feng Ying Yu, who through adroit negotiation and sheer determination managed to get us all to Beijing for the conference that inspired the content you find here. We cannot conceive of more inspiring and gracious hosts.

To follow future developments of the project, please visit http://law.hamline.edu/rethinkingnegotiation.html. There you will find the latest project updates, lists of participating scholars, and all book chapters generated to date in downloadable pdf formats (at no charge), as well as a link to issues of 谈判 Tán Pàn, to be published in Hong Kong as a joint project of the Dispute Resolution Institute at Hamline University School of Law and the International Institute for Conflict Engagement and Resolution (IICER) in the Department of Law and Business at Hong Kong Shue Yan University.
